Under escort of Prof. Barnum Brown of the American Museum a highly important cargo of bones has arrived in town. The bones are petrified, and belonged to animals that roamed through the West from three to eight millions of years ago.

They were all dinosaurs, and several of them are newly discovered species. Prof. Brown has been in charge of the expedition sent out by the Museum to Montana to look for them.

The first of the bones is a trochantion, or duck billed dinosaur. He was forty-five feet long and weighed about 15 tons. It was fifteen feet long, his body twenty feet, and his skull four or five feet. Prof. Brown has his entire petrified skeleton. In the trochantion's jaws were 250 teeth, and he was used to walk with two powerful hind legs and his tail, like a tripod, supporting the succulent leaves from the tops of trees. He also browsed on marine vegetation, and being amphibious could keep his head under water for a long time.

Another complete skeleton is a ceratopsian, or horned dinosaur, with horns on its face. There are parts of a huge plated dinosaur, parts of two other trochantions, and a carnivorous dinosaur, who he thinks, killed all the other dinosaurs in some gigantic battle, and received death wound when he tackled the last of the herbivorous dinosaurs.
